1. The first class of the Piscicultural Institute, Constanta, graduated in February 1951. For admittance to the school, students were divided into the following categories:

- a. Category I, for sons of workers, required a minimum mark of five on the entrance examinations.
- b. Category II, for sons of professional workers and craftsmen, required a minimum mark of six on the entrance examinations.
- c. Category III, for sons of farmers and industrialists, required a minimum mark of seven on the entrance examinations.

In practice, only applicants falling in the first two categories were able to enter the Institute.

2. Professors were required to give passing marks to those students selected by the Communist Party to attend the courses. The professors who failed to follow the orders were accused of "cosmopolitanism". Usually only two or three percent of the students failed to receive passing marks and those usually had "unhealthy social origins".
